

Two brothers living under the burden of expectation on a collision course with the shadows of a tragic past... For the past year, seventeen-year-old Chase Peterson has been at war with the word should. He should go to college. He should give up on the Marines. He should stop trying to be like his brother, Danny. Its the summer after graduation. His brother is home from the Corps, fresh out of Afghanistan, and only three short months remain until Chase can sign his own Marine enlistment contract. It was supposed to be great. Its turning into a slow hell. His girlfriend dumps him. Hes shoveling horse manure to make a buck after giving up his job for Danny, and his parents wont drop their college campaign. The worst is Dannys descent into self-destruction—fighting, drinking, and run-ins with the law. All Chases attempts to connect with his brother lead only to more frustration, and Danny just keeps slipping farther away. As Chase struggles to understand Danny, he finds an unlikely ally in Olga Gutierrez, the girl hes been trying to ignore for the past five years. However, when a final betrayal threatens to destroy the brothers relationship forever and exposes the truth of a long-kept secret about Olgas own brothers death in Iraq, Chase will come to question everything he once thought he knew about Danny and himself.
