Excerpt from Consular Reports, Vol. 43: Commerce, Manufactures, Etc., September, 1893

The pertinent question in this connection is how much of this vast total the United States will be able to furnish at prices within the artificial limit now established by the retaliatory tariffs, which, so far as they go, are enactments by both Germany and Russia in favor of all other producing countries, and notably the United States. As to petroleum and petroleum products, it may be assumed that nearly the entire supply which Germany has hitherto derived from Russia will be imported, so long as the present status continues, from the United States. Already, yesterday, a large order for lubricating oils was placed with the agent of an American firm by the purchasing agent of the Prussian State railways, which have hitherto purchased their entire supply in Russia. In 1892, which was agriculturally a fair average year in Germany, this country imported from Russia, as we have seen, $21,420,000 worth of rye alone. This year the deficit in the German home crop is greater than in 1892, and the demand will be proportionately increased.
