

Certain Towns and Cities Adjacent to Boston: And the Boston Edison System (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Certain Towns and Cities Adjacent to Boston: And the Boston Edison System It must always be of evident value and benefit, at due times, to exhibit the progress made in the development or practice of every art or science or industry. Doubtless the value and benefit are the greater, certainly they are the more obvious, the closer is the relation of the subject of the exhibition to life and the more intimately it is associated with the interests of a large number of human beings. Electricity bears that relation and is so associated. Every one shares directly or indirectly in its advantages, whether it be used in any of its modern and minor applications, as a source of power, or to produce illumination. Moreover, there has been remarkable progress in the production, distribution and economical management of electricity; there has been a marvelous multiplication of its practical and useful applications.
