

One in every three girls and one in every six boys experience childhood sexual abuse before the age of eighteen. This epidemic scars the lives of millions every year. In this book, Kiesa Kay draws on her years as a child advocate and forensic interviewer to discuss the nature of sex abuse, when and where it occurs, the steps we can take to prevent it, and how we can help a child who has been hurt. Because the perpetrator is often either the child's own parent or a close relative or a family friend, grandparents may be among the first to know or suspect that a child is being molested. A loving grandparent may well be the only person in whom the child can confide. And because grandparents are a source of unconditional love, they can also be a source of strength and safety and healing for a shattered life. The author's mission is to end child abuse. If we ended slavery, she writes, we can end child abuse. The key is knowledge. We need to understand the problem, and we need to know the steps we must take to keep our children safe.
